The court case challenging Canada's public healthcare

Colleen Flood walks us through the case challenging the constitutionality of certain healthcare laws in B.C., and what she thinks can be done to help with the long wait times Canadians are currently facing in the healthcare system.

For the best listening experience and to never miss an episode, subscribe to The Decibel on your favourite podcast app or platform: Apple Podcasts, Spotify, Amazon Music, Stitcher, Google Podcasts, iHeartRadio, Pocket Casts and Youtube.

On Friday, B.C.'s Court of Appeal upheld a lower court's decision that access to medical care should be based on need and not the ability to pay. The court sided with the B.C. government's argument that allowing private care would endanger the public system. For 13 years, orthopedic surgeon and president of Cambie Surgery, Brian Day has argued that patients should have the right to pay out-of-pocket for medically necessary care when wait times in the public system are too long. Even though the court disagreed, this case could still end up at the Supreme Court of Canada.

Colleen Flood is the director of the Centre for Health Law, Policy and Ethics and University Research Chair at the University of Ottawa. She's on the show to talk about the implications of the case and what she thinks can be done to help with the long wait times Canadians are currently facing in the healthcare system.

Follow this link to view this story on globeandmail.com: The court case challenging Canada's public healthcare

This article appeared in The Globe and Mail (web site)